Melodic Death - with a classic Thrash Metal broadside!

DYING HUMANITY, founded in early 2006, delivered with "Fragments Of An Incomplete Puzzle" their second long player. Already with their debut from 2007, "Fallen Paradise", their gathered superior positive feedback within Germany and Europe and it wasn't easy for the band to be caught between two stools of technically inspired Death Metal and classic Thrash Metal. Also with the following stuff, the band is and was willing to swear off the preference for neither the one, nor the other. Consequentially, the band follows this path also with their now available second release, doing that much more consistently - in both directions!

Listeners can await one brute Thrash Metal riffing-thunderstorm after the other, garnished with mean Death Metal growls and likewise nasty screams, a proper portion of technical finesse (arising from their pure joy to play music), along with really classic elements such as old-school guitar solos and calm melodic parts, but which pour forth at once into ecstatic progressions. Regardless to which modern trend one can assign this album to, the bridge to the zenith of Thrash Metal is always present.

The album was recorded and produced at Coburg Fortefortissimo Recordings, whereas for the mastering one took the chance to step across the big pond to Alan Douches into the WestWestSideMusic Studio (Carnifex, Uneath, Killswitch Engage). A combination that was worth it and assuring a transparent but nevertheless mighty wall of sound.
